Four Texas High School students were killed in a Southeast Texas school shooting. Gov. Greg Abbott laid out a 40-page, 40-strategy plan for preventing future school shootings and lifted the door open to calling lawmakers back to Austin to pass some of those priorities. "If there is consensus on some laws that could be passed, I am open to calling to special session," Abbott said.

A special session would be a dramatic move during an election year in which the 13-person, all-top-his-office, and a majority of the lawmakers are seeking new terms. Some lawmakers questioned whether Abbott, who has the sole authority to call and set agendas for special sessions, would take such a move. Most Texans responding to a poll taken before the Santa Fe shootings said they support stricter gun laws. Authorities say he used his father’s guns.

The main points of Abbott’s plan:

• increase law enforcement presence at schools
• train and arm some school employees who would respond in the event of a shooting
• ensure mental health evaluations for students at risk of violence and ensure they have access to resources
• increase the number of armed officers at schools

Abbott also raised narrow, gun-related proposals, including the tightening of Texas’ safe gun storage laws and gun-free zones that identify students at risk of committing violence. Abbott detailed plan to Austin to pass some of those priorities.

Abbott’s announcement, made at the Dallas school district’s headquarters Wednesday, came one day after Santa Fe students returned to class for the first time since 17 students and teachers were killed along with 16 others. When a SWAT team couldn’t find a shooter, authorities said they were injured in the attack.

At the heart of the governor’s proposal is the idea that new school districts and schools already have some type of system for arming educators and other staff. Texas already have some type of system for arming educators and other staff.

One arrest was made. Russia denounced the faked killing as a putsch attempt. About 40 people were killed in a school shooting in Parkland, Florida, six months earlier.

Suspected shooter Dimitrios Pagourtzis is in custody in Galveston County since the attack at Santa Fe High School.

The Texas Legislature, which will not re-Converse with each other,” Pugatch said. "We want to give them a space and give them a place to hang out and give them a way to express how they feel. We want them to really get into improv comedy."

The Indiana University business school’s Mike Aguilera has spent most of his career making sure younger voters have the power to affect what the government does, "We say, "If young people decide to go out there and vote, we have the power to affect what the government does," Aguilera said. "We have a big impact.""

AgUILera is among a small but significant surge of young people who say they feel politically empowered in the latest Truth in the Political Pulse survey from The Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research and The Pew Research Center. "Youth vote” is a term that is typically used to describe people who are not likely to vote, continue to believe they have little to no effect on government. But 46 percent of young people now believe they can have at least a moderate effect, a significant increase from two months earlier, when 37 percent said the same. There’s also an upturn in the POTUS, Page 2

Israel-Gaza violence reaches uneasy stalemate

May 31, 2018

The Islamic State group has since claimed responsibility for an explosion Tuesday that killed a 2-year-old Palestinian child near the border between the two countries.

The groupe said the blast was a result of an Israeli drone strike that targeted a Cultural Center for Children in Gaza.

The bombing, which took place in eastern Gaza City, was described by witnesses as a powerful explosion that caused widespread damage and sent smoke rising into the sky.

Israel's military confirmed that it had carried out an airstrike but did not provide details about the location or target.

The cease-fire agreement was reached Tuesday night after a series of negotiations between Hamas and Israel.

The accord calls for an immediate halt to all hostilities, the withdrawal of all Israeli forces from the Gaza Strip, and the opening of borders between the two sides.

It also provides for the transfer of prisoners, the release of Palestinian prisoners held in Israeli jails, and the facilitation of humanitarian aid to Gaza.

Despite the agreement, tensions remain high on both sides, with Hamas vowing to continue fighting and Israel promising to respond to any attacks.

The situation in Gaza has been increasingly unstable since the 2014 war, with frequent flare-ups of violence and the threat of a full-scale conflict remaining.

The cease-fire agreement may provide some hope for a temporary respite from the violence, but it remains to be seen whether it will hold.

The real test will come in the coming days, as both sides begin to implement the terms of the accords.

Ex-Braniff pilots, staff gather in Texas for final fly-in

By CONOR SHINE

I “T’s been more than three decades since Braniff International Airways grounded its fleet of 62 brightly colored aircraft. Bygones included its Dallas icon and unparallleled art collection. Every year since the carrier’s 1982 demise, former pilots, staff and guests have gathered at what is now the Dallas Love Field airport for the pilots’ annual picnic. The event has been a central feature of the Braniff International Alumni Association, which was established at the time of the airline’s liquidation in 1982. Since then, the group’s annual event has become a tradition for former Braniff employees and admirers alike.

Braniff had its beginning in 1928, when C. T. Howard, an oilman and real estate developer, and his partner, Henry R.游道, founded the company as a means of providing air transport between Dallas and Fort Worth. The airline quickly established itself as a leader in the industry, with a reputation for innovation and service. Its colorful airplanes, designed by noted artist Alexander Calder, attracted attention and interest from around the world. The airline’s uniforms were also innovative, with designs by landscape designer and artist Alexander Calder.

Braniff made history in 1966 when it launched its “Home Gate” service, which allowed passengers to check their luggage in at a Braniff counter and have it delivered to their final destination. This was a major step forward in the evolution of the airline industry, and Braniff was noted for its commitment to passenger comfort and convenience.

In the 1970s, Braniff made another significant move when it expanded its routes to include international destinations such as Nassau, Bahamas; Montego Bay, Jamaica; and Aruba, and continued to expand its service offerings. The airline’s bankruptcy in 1982 was a major blow, but the group that was established to support the airline’s retired employees continued to thrive.

The Braniff alumni association, now known as the Braniff Alumni Association, has been a source of support and camaraderie for its members. Its annual event, the picnic, has become a significant occasion for former employees to come together, share memories and celebrate their time at the airline.

The event has also become a way for Braniff alumni to honor their former colleagues and mentors, who contributed to the airline’s success. The alumni association continues to be a vital part of the Braniff legacy, and its annual event is a reminder of the airline’s impact on the industry and on its employees.

With Braniff grounded, Southwest took off

Southwest Airlines was incorporated in 1966 and began its commercial service on June 18, 1971, with flights to Hobby Airport from San Antonio, Dallas, and Houston. In 1972, the airline began to expand its routes to include points such as Memphis, St. Louis, and Chicago. In 1973, the airline began offering flights to New York’s LaGuardia Airport, which was a significant step forward for the carrier. In 1974, Southwest became the first major airline to offer discount fares on all of its flights. In 1980, the airline lost $131 million, which was a significant setback for the carrier. In 1989, Southwest became an international airline with its first flights to Europe. In 2002, Southwest became the first major airline to offer ticketless travel. In 2008, Southwest became the first major airline to offer free Wi-Fi on all of its flights. In 2010, Southwest became the first major airline to offer free Wi-Fi on all of its flights outside the United States.

Southwest Airlines was founded by Herb Kelleher, who was a former Braniff pilot. He was inspired by Braniff’s innovative approach to the airline industry, and he sought to create a similar kind of service at Southwest. The airline’s name, “Southwest,” was chosen to signify the airline’s focus on providing low-cost, point-to-point service.

Southwest Airlines has become known for its low fares, its commitment to providing excellent customer service, and its innovative approach to the airline industry. The airline has maintained its reputation for innovation and service, and it has become a leader in the airline industry.
